For now, I'm simply storing the data in a text file, using (in the FindText() function), j = ThisLogin.currentUser.account.userAccount.userID strFName = ThisLogin.currentUser.currentDocument.text

`InDocument.documentText path =
App.pathForFilename(strFName, j) fileDialog1.FileName = path` This works, but my question is this: Is there a better, more effective way for me to store this user input for each document in a file that can be used across my applications? Since the text file is easily accessible, the user can easily edit it, and I don't have a need to deploy/transmit the file in any way. However, storing it in a database seems more useful if the user has a permanent connection to the server. A: As a first step, consider getting your hands on a copy of the Jet Database or the FileA_POS database (for FileMaker) and familiarize yourself with the two Databases that are used to manage all data local to the application. If you are not familiar with Jet Database, you may want to take a look at the CodeTable VB6 Library which is open source and has some really nice examples on how to manipulate Jet Database tables using VB6. The nice thing about an OO language such as VB6 is the ability to let your classes do the work for you. The CodeTable library may be a bit advanced for a beginner but if you look at the articles, they don't require a lot of code and are straightforward to understand. If you are already familiar with using Jet Database, then you can start with the TextDatabase, which is really straightforward to use, especially with the FileA_POS Database. As a tutorial on Text Database, I would suggest you take a look at SQLite Developer and the
