[Atrial fibrillation and ventricular rate control with atrial selective stimulation]. Atrial fibrillation (AF) is a major source of cardiovascular morbidity and mortality. Pharmacological and non-pharmacological therapies of AF have failed to alleviate the clinical course of AF. Atrial fibrillation termination might be induced by electrical cardioversion. But, particularly in severely symptomatic patients with AF, such cardioversion at the time of AF induction can be complicated by the risk of thromboembolism. One interesting method to induce AF termination is to use selective and bi-atrial atrial pacing. Selective stimulation of the right and left atrial appendages (low energy stimulation) was performed in 74 patients with symptomatic paroxysmal AF. The following parameters were evaluated by the Holter-ECG: 1) frequency and duration of AF, 2) ventricular rate, 3) atrial conduction, 4) presence and duration of tachycardia. Selective stimulation failed to terminate AF in the majority of patients (73%). Ventricular rate did not influence the outcome of atrial stimulation. No difference was observed regarding the duration of the AF and tachycardia episodes (in % of the total recording time) at the beginning and the end of atrial stimulation. Atrial selective stimulation did not improve the atrial conduction in AF compared to conventional atrial pacing. Several patients with a successful AF termination converted to sinus rhythm immediately after the end of atrial stimulation. The left ventricular filling rate (MES-C signal) was significantly lower during the first minutes after successful atrial stimulation. The failure of atrial selective stimulation to induce AF termination in the majority of patients suggests that selective atrial stimulation might be useful for the emergency treatment of AF or may be performed as a chronic therapy in patients with symptomatic paroxysmal AF. However, the non-selective or unspecific stimulation atria might induce a more profound cardiac stunning, the immediate loss of atrial function and a risk of tachyarrhythmic conversion.Q: How to read the std::array inside std::tuple for each elements?
