Q: Dynamically Instantiating Classes with Parameterized Constructors Disclaimer: I am very new to Java I have a set of classes that I would like to allow users to use without needing to explicitly pass a type to the class (since what is passed may vary). So I decided to write an abstract class that would be implemented by each concrete class (to some extent) and have a generic getInstance() method that would be invoked. To do this, I thought I would have to create a parameterized constructor, since this would be necessary in order to be able to instantiate a class that was not specified in the abstract class. However, doing so seems to make the parameterized constructor non-functional, since even when I do pass a type in (in the abstract class), I cannot invoke the superclass constructor without also passing a type. The Java

The program works very intuitively, coming with a comprehensive help menu that enables you to comprehend the program's advanced features and options. Quickbooks has all the necessary tools to facilitate both the company bookkeeping and its employees. This is a great overall business software, that is utilized by many small businesses. I just received my 1st copy of the software. I have used small business software on and off for years. This has been my first time working with Quickbooks and I am impressed. The setup of the program was straight forward and took all of 5 minutes. The program is well designed and all of the options are very easy to navigate. I did find a couple of small issues. 1) The program is still in beta mode, some of the new features will be added in the next update. 2) The program runs with a 32 bit version of windows. If you are running a 64 bit version of windows, you will encounter a problem with memory, when running the program. 3) If you have your computer configured to save images with a profile, the images are saved with your profile name. If you relaunch the program with a different profile, the images will not be saved with your new profile name. My small business runs off of MS SQL server with the data stored on a local network share on my machine. I had to make a few setup adjustments to the SQL server to make it work. Again, I am not an expert with the SQL server, I just know how to make the connection to the data. I use the software on a regular basis and have been very happy with how the product has evolved. I would recommend this product for a small business with ease. Everyone
