FIFA 22 also includes increased Player Impact Engine, as well as smarter Refereeing. With transfer news arriving almost every day in the lead up to the FIFA Superbowl, we've seen the first transfer deals enter the game (in our opinion at least) as of 6th February.

In the first update today, we aim to focus on the many changes that have been brought to the game's key systems, including Player Impact Engine, Player Fit and Player Intelligence. You may also want to check out our analysis and comparison of all the new transfer news and potential deals. First up, we've listed all the latest transfers in the game in one place, as well as the latest on the deals that have recently been completed and are about to be announced. The last few transfers mentioned may not have been fully completed yet. The Player Impact Engine allows players to react to various actions and movements of opponents on the pitch. The engine is driven by data collected from player motion, tackles, aerial duels and on-ball actions, and can help score goals, build attacks, create chances for shooting, set up your team's defensive shape, and open up the pitch. This means that teams are often seen as one single unit, and we often see them try to work together to try and open up the pitch for their creative players. With Player Impact Engine, teams will now be split into individual players based on their position and based on the amount of important data collected from them. This data is then used to give every player a unique 'play style'. When players are within their own team, this may be affected by their role and position, but when players are away from their own team, their 'play style' will be affected by the selected formation and position of the team. What are the various positions of a Player? There are seven positions in the game. Only two of these positions are player-specific, and are known as 'Position Players' - but the
