Drug-induced liver injury (DILI) is a major clinical problem. The probability of drug-induced liver injury depends on the underlying factors (genetic and environmental), the pharmacokinetics and pharmacodynamics of the drug, and the sensitivity of the liver to the drug. This article reviews pharmacogenetic and pharmacokinetic aspects of DILI, with a focus on the identification of genetic risk factors for DILI. Although it is unlikely that the concept of pharmacogenetic drug-induced liver injury will be approved as a diagnostic or prognostic clinical test in the near future, certain pharmacogenetic factors can be used to individualize dosing regimens, minimizing exposure to those drugs that are hepatotoxic, including acetaminophen, valproic acid, cyclosporine A, tamoxifen, and diltiazem. Future studies will need to address the clinical and cost-effectiveness of pharmacogenetic testing.Use of circulating genomic and synthetic oligonucleotides in combination with microarrays for characterizing tumour markers. With the development of new bioinformatics technologies, molecular profiling of blood has the potential to complement and even replace traditional tissue biopsies for cancer diagnosis. In this review we will assess the use of such circulating genomic and synthetic oligonucleotides in combination with microarrays as a surrogate tissue biopsy for identifying biomarkers, as well as profiling the tumour microenvironment.Many processes
