Primary support for the subproject and the subproject's principal investigator may have been provided by other sources, including other NIH sources. The Total Cost listed for the subproject likely represents the estimated amount of Center infrastructure utilized by the subproject, not direct funding provided by the NCRR grant to the subproject or subproject staff. The purpose of this study is to gain more information about how gene therapy affects the nervous system in the SOD mouse model of ALS. The viral vector is designed to transduce oligodendrocytes as well as motor neurons. The CNS-restricted promoter (CMV) is an attractive gene transfer target for neurological disease, including ALS. There is compelling evidence that oxidative stress may play an important role in ALS pathogenesis. Furthermore, recent research suggests that glial cells are likely to play a greater role in ALS pathogenesis than previously thought, and could be a potential target for therapeutic intervention. The presence of the human copper/zinc superoxide dismutase (SOD1) gene under the control of the murine glial fibrillary acidic protein (GFAP) promoter and an HSV-1 thymidine kinase (TK) gene under the control of a neuron-specific enolase (NSE) promoter in the same vector is expected to confer site-specific transcriptional regulation of transgene expression. The CMV promoter is useful for targeting glial cells, which are selectively susceptible to virus infection and which exhibit relatively high levels of transgene expression. The GF
