Antiplatelet therapy has demonstrated a significant reduction of cardiovascular events in patients undergoing percutaneous coronary intervention (PCI).¹ However, despite recent achievements in percutaneous treatment of coronary artery disease (CAD), PCI still has a major drawback, i.e. coronary artery restenosis or reocclusion (ARR).² Hence, ARR and the resulting necessity of repeat PCI pose a substantial patient risk and cost burden on the health system. The pathophysiology of ARR is multifactorial. The concept of focal intimal damage in the treated coronary artery segment is currently accepted, and is supported by histologic investigations, atherosclerotic lesion content and platelet deposition.³ However, as the high-risk coronary lesion most frequently undergoes PCI treatment, it seems rational to assume that potent antiplatelet therapy may be most effective and safe for preventing ARR. If the beneficial effect of antiplatelet therapy on ARR is confirmed, the use of dual antiplatelet therapy with aspirin and clopidogrel would be recommended in the treatment of CAD patients who undergo PCI.⁴ With that in mind, the Translational Research Center for Angioplasty and Interventional Therapy was established to encourage further research and development of antiplatelet therapies for the prevention of ARR. This program includes the development of new antiplatelet drugs with more potent platelet inhibition and fewer adverse events, as well as further optimization of existing drugs. In this context, we are currently exploring the effect of the selective cyclooxygenase-2 (COX-2) inhibitor,
