Brain size is positively correlated with body size in most mammals. By contrast, birds have larger brains relative to their body size than mammals. The cause for this disparity is still unclear. Here, we review the theoretical and empirical evidence for the role of allometric brain-body scaling across mammalian groups (including reptiles, birds, and primates) and evaluate the strengths and weaknesses of different models. We find that the scaling pattern of brain size to body size is conserved across mammalian groups, but its slope is substantially smaller in birds compared with mammals. This is consistent with a proposal that differences in relative brain size are a function of the specialized roles that are played by the neocortex in mammals and birds. Our results therefore challenge the hypothesis that brain size is simply a secondary product of the evolution of locomotion or, in the case of birds, flight, and are instead consistent with the idea that the evolution of brain size has been influenced by selection for specialized cognitive abilities.Amazon Loses After Price Drop, Reeling From China Lawsuit Amazon.com Inc. stock took another major tumble on Monday, with shares falling 6 percent after the company announced a 10 percent price drop for its Kindle ebook reader.
