The dradis project aims to provide an easy-to-use, yet powerful, testing framework for detecting software weaknesses. While there are several open source software for security testing and bug hunting, this project focuses on giving the end-user the opportunity to share information and to avoid duplication of efforts. While the project currently concentrates on Windows, it is also being used to test other platforms (for example, MacOS X) with the potential to switch to other platforms. The dradis tests are developed using python, with a C and a java component which allows to obtain relevant information. The dradis project is still under development, and it is a work in progress. This is reflected in the quality of the tests. For this reason, users should be cautious when trying dradis. At the time being, testing information is only saved to a per-user account, and not to a central database. Moreover, there are reports that dradis might be affected by known vulnerabilities of Python 2.6. Note: dradis includes a known virus "W32/GmerFinger" in its C component. If the C component is not configured to detect it, this virus can alter dradis results.
