As the density of a printed circuit board (PCB) increases, so does the need for a heat-soak dielectric on the surface of the board. In applications involving energy storage, power electronics or energy harvesting and power distribution, such as power electronics in a hybrid electric vehicle (HEV), a metal-core PCB configuration is often used. The metal-core configuration includes a metal core having a low-density top surface for absorbing heat, and a dielectric core that surrounds the metal core and has a higher density. Typically the dielectric core is laminated to the top surface of the metal core. Electronic components such as diodes, light emitting diodes (LED), and capacitors are formed on the dielectric core. When the electronic components are formed by a thick film method, a thick copper film is used to cover the whole dielectric core, while electronic components are formed on a surface of the dielectric core. When the electronic components are formed by a thin film method, a thin copper film is used to cover a certain portion of the dielectric core, while the electronic components are formed on a surface of the dielectric core. Generally, electronic components are formed on the surface of the dielectric core, such that an energy management module, a power module, a vehicle architecture module, and the like, can be integrated into a single package. The thick film method produces a mechanically robust
