According to IHS iSuppli, a market research company, in 2013 AutoCAD and the other AutoCAD products (DWG, eCAD, LT, and XW) accounted for 16% of CAD software revenues. In 2012, AutoCAD revenues were $723.7 million, compared to $655.2 million in 2011, representing growth of about 1.4%. Revenue per license was $3,983 in 2012 compared to $3,601 in 2011, an increase of 14%. Features AutoCAD is licensed by users in single user mode, multi-user mode, or network license mode. For single user mode, the user can purchase a license for a particular piece of software for a fixed period of time. A standard license is valid for one year. In multi-user mode, the user is also assigned a serial number that can be used by other people to log on to the same computer. Thus, the number prevents multiple users from using the software simultaneously on a single computer. In network license mode, the user is assigned a unique number that can be used by other people on a network to log on to the same computer. In single user mode, the program is usually stored on the local hard drive and the license number (serial number) is entered into the program before the user is permitted to use the program. In network license mode, the program is usually stored on a server, and the user's license number is entered into the program by the server before the user is permitted to use the program. AutoCAD has been one of the most widely used computer-aided design programs in the world, having over 70 million users as of 2009. AutoCAD can be used for the creation of 2D drawings (2D), 3D models (3D), and a combination of 2D and 3D (2D and 3D). A drafting workbench is used for 2D (including 2D drafting) operations, whereas a modeling workbench is used for 3D operations. A 3D modeling workbench is not always required, however, as AutoCAD LT (Lite) can be used with AutoCAD and other CAD programs to create 2D drawings, including for 2D drafting. 2D drawings 2D AutoCAD drawing operations are supported by the following commands: Command Description (Capitalized/Lower Case/Underscore): Name

I would like to create the following type: type Tuple = [X, Y, Z]; But I can't find anything in the official docs for this. Is it possible at all? If not, what would be the standard way to accomplish this? A: The literal syntax you mentioned is simply an alias for Array. Since that type has an identifier already, you can use it as the type of a tuple. The man who had sex with the corpse of American Airlines flight #1112 was arrested after police found his semen on the dead woman. According to court records, the man, whom police have not identified, had sexual intercourse with the body of the late passenger aboard the flight. Court documents state that the man had sexual intercourse with the body "at least two weeks prior to the body being recovered." The man was arrested on suspicion of human trafficking and solicitation of a crime. John Charles Zaragoza, the man who had sex with a dead woman aboard an American Airlines flight

#1112, has been released on a $20,000 bond. Credit: Police in Corpus Christi, TX According to ABC News, the man is the alleged boyfriend of the deceased woman and was arrested as the flight was preparing to land in Corpus Christi. The man had been with the woman all week and the couple had exchanged text messages prior to the woman's death. The flight left from San Jose, Costa Rica on April 5th, headed for Miami. According to ABC News, the flight was delayed for nearly 12 hours and was finally allowed to land in Corpus Christi around 7:30 am, on April 6th. When the body of the deceased was located in the aft lavatory, police and emergency responders had to manually break open the bathroom door. The flight attendant had seen the woman's body in the aisle of the plane and immediately alerted the pilot. American Airlines stated in a statement that the man ca3bfb1094

The origin of monocular saccadic visual memory deficits in schizophrenia: a study using emotional and non-emotional stimuli. Visual memory deficits in schizophrenia are not present during intact visual perception, but appear after a delay of several seconds. These deficits have been shown to be related to the delay between the stimulus presentation and the initiation of the saccade. The present study examined whether the visual memory deficit was present during intact perception and whether it could be related to other impaired abilities, such as identification of emotional facial expressions. Thirty-one schizophrenia outpatients and 31 healthy controls were presented with two different versions of a stimulus depicting a series of faces. Stimulus type (neutral vs. emotional) and stimulus material (human faces vs. non-human faces) were crossed within participants. During the memory task, participants had to look at the faces of the series until the second face appeared. After a delay of 3-10 s the probe faces were presented and participants had to indicate if it was identical to the face presented at the beginning of the series. In both healthy participants and patients with schizophrenia, longer stimulus presentation times (compared to shorter stimulus presentation times) induced a loss of recognition for faces, but there was no effect of stimulus type on the outcome of the recognition task. Our results show that the visual memory deficit occurs in schizophrenia patients after a delay of several seconds, regardless of the stimulus material used. We cannot find a correlation between memory deficits and impaired facial recognition abilities. In addition, the use of emotional facial expressions did not affect the outcome of the memory task.While the world waits for the first shots fired in the 18th year of the Syrian war to be heard by the ears of the people of Syria, a ceasefire and peace talks to take place in Geneva III, a reconstruction conference in Tishrin Dam and a refugees conference in Berlin, a massive military exercise is taking place on the Syrian-Turkish border. The Afrin operation is also about to mark the beginning of a new phase in the conflict. And this new phase could herald the end of the war, or the beginning of a new and even bloodier conflict. The Afrin operation began on 20 January, after a military operation by the Turkish army in the south east of the enclave, targeting Kurdish armed groups. The Turkish army, in coordination with Free Syrian Army (FSA) and White Helmets militants, supported by some of the local population, managed to capture 17 villages and positions. The Turkish assault has significantly
