So here's the new game to take advantage of the Skyshock demo. It is another insane level of fun and satisfying, looking at the screenshots it is also a lot less arcadey (but not much) than the last level that we showed you. The trailer will be online in a bit, and the answer to that question is yes, we are going to release the game as a real and separate release (rather than our usual desktop bundle). So why the 'coder' view of the game? Because I am an ex-journalist and I hate repeating myself, but also because it is really a chance for me to be the nerdiest of nerds and explain things to you. Also I know that most of you are quite tired of the same view, so...yeah, I guess I'm a nerd. Okay, first of all, let's take a look at the 'coder' view, or how the game works in a completely different way than you would expect. How the game works First, let's briefly explain what SkyShocker is all about. It is a scientific game, where you shoot at objects, get rid of them by hitting them with high velocity projectiles, and you've got to build up your 'cannon' so you can get as many points as possible. The 'normal' view is called 'cursor view', and it is the view the player gets when using a mouse. The cursor view is used when a user holds down a mouse button to fire a projectile. The projectile travels on the screen, and you can turn it into a curving trajectory by pressing the right mouse button. It is called 'cursor view' because the laser beam is normally situated over the right mouse button, which is how it is operated. But here is how it works: the cursor view works, but only one direction! You have the projectiles on the screen, and you can look to where they are going to, and which direction. You can only fire at the objects that are in the 'visible' area. The laser beam will only travel on the screen while the mouse button is pressed. But there's a catch! The mouse button only changes direction when you change the orientation of the cursor view. So when you look at the mouse, you can see the curving trajectory. If the object that is hit is a piece of terrain, then the laser beam will move to

"Konnichiwa!" (Remastered English Mix) by 7 Spiral 6 OUTPOST is an underground movie blog. We present authentic feature films shot by independent filmmakers around the globe. Music is the soundtrack to our feature films. Film works can be viewed on the Official OUTPOST Channel on YouTube and iTunes (with synced music). SUBSCRIBE to OUTPOST! With a full-length Japanese horror film already under their belts, 7 Spiral 6 returns to their signature sound of chillingly (Japanese style) ambient and disturbing dream pop. While it does not seem to be on a scale of, say, Neosignal or Abstractions, the clarity of the dreamy electronic textures and their consistently disturbingly smooth reverb created an opaque setting for elaborately elliptical music themes that seemed to foreshadow the feature film while remaining quietly believable in their way. The music begins and the scene is set. The morning has come and I was unable to fall asleep. I had tried meditating but all I had was fuzz and static. I had tried listening to headphones, laying in the tub, but nothing seemed to work. Then I noticed this little green flash in the corner of the room... I was awed...and terrified that a) if I dared open my eyes, this flash would vanish (subconscious intuition telling me that...) and b) if I opened my eyes, what would I see? As I thought about it further, I slowly came to the conclusion that I was in a dream world. So, I decided to just make the best of the situation and give it a try. The flashes were a sign that I could leave my body at any moment. And I thought that it might seem quite good to wake up inside the dream. Though I still was in the outside world, I felt the same strange feeling that I usually did when going into a dream. My mind had a hard time to keep track of those thoughts and memories, so it would sometimes drift back to the past, continuing the dream. At times it would bring me to places I hadn't been before...places I was afraid to be in... Soon I could tell that I was in a small, wooden corner room. But it felt more like it was in a ship. It was warm. Everything in the room was soft. I looked down and saw that I was wearing nothing...a dream could be a lot of fun without clothes, right?
