Real time web chart system I am building a real time web chart system to display datasets from a database using an external API. What I am missing is good examples that would point me in the right direction when working with external APIs. I have looked at some other questions on stackoverflow, for example this one And i think i know what the problem is but this is an external API as i am using the free version (provided by the API provider). Unfortunately, I can't ask the provider because i am not sure that they would appreciate. I also like to mention that i am a beginner and am not looking for whole projects but more specific examples such as: Should i use Ajax? Should i use a proxy? Should i use JQuery/javascript or no? How can i allow the user to drop a button that allows them to go to a specific position in the chart? Thanks for your time and I hope I'm not too vague. A: This is a general problem for all front-end programming, i.e. you don't have full control over the back-end technology. Your best option might be to try to write a stateless JavaScript program that works well with a static back-end server (i.e. doesn't change once loaded/refreshed). If you're using a database, you might be able to separate the data of the chart from the graph via a series of queries on the database. Depending on your server tech, you might try to store data in the browser's cache, and if the request expires, request fresh data from the server. For simplicity, you'd probably create a file on the server with the latest data. To generate the graph, you can use SVG for the client. You'll need to write the SVG on the server side. For your button, you should probably use an `input type="button"` tag instead of a `button` tag. The `type="button"` will just generate an `input type="button"` tag, rather than actually submitting the form. You also might want to look into using jQuery UI Slider, a popular slider control which is pretty easy to implement.
