Molecular modeling and biochemical studies reveal that the aryl hydrocarbon receptor-binding domain of beta-defensins exhibit a distinct conformation depending on their host cells. Beta-defensins are a group of small peptides, which are produced by the myeloid cells. They have been demonstrated to play an important role in innate immunity, antifungal activity and anti-proliferation. However, the mechanism of their actions has not been fully revealed. Recently, the fact has been proven that the aryl hydrocarbon receptor (AhR) is a ligand-dependent transcription factor and plays an important role in the regulation of immune response. We carried out the molecular modeling study of beta-defensins in this study. The results showed that most of the receptors (AhR, AhR nuclear translocator and v-rel reticuloendotheliosis viral oncogene homolog A) adopt a closed conformation, but the ligand binding domain of AhR (LBD) exhibits a considerable variation in the structure, depending on the cell types, AhR agonists and antagonists. As a result, the AhR-defens
