The objects are reasonably large so I'm not keen on just allocating a new memory for each object. I need to avoid running out of memory. What are the options for memory management in java? Am I best to use a pool of objects or are there other approaches I should consider? I'm thinking of creating my own static class that keeps a pool of the objects and can be accessed via reflection. What's your opinion of this approach? A: A better question is: What are the options for memory management in your platform, and what do you want to do with it? Do you have a fixed number of objects you need to process in a specific order, or can you create/destroy them as needed? I'd look at the standard Java tools for this, specifically ThreadLocal and PerfData: If your objects are not huge (but maybe fairly large), this will work fine. If you are processing the same kind of object over and over, you might be able to leverage the Java G1 GC, which is geared towards object reuse (but you will need to invest some time to figure out how to apply this). If you don't really know what you're doing, you might try a profiler to help you figure out what is actually causing your memory problems. A: If you are 1d6a3396d6
